

Rights of First Purchase

(Offer, Negotiation and Refusal)

The holder of a right of first purchase has the opportunity to purchase a property before it is sold to another. The opportunity may be for the holder to accept or make an offer on the property before it is placed on the market, to negotiate with the owners before it is exposed to the market, to match the offer of a third party buyer after the property has been on the market, or a combination of these opportunities.

Introduction 1

Creating Opportunity 1

Model Documents 1

Comparison of Purchase Rights 2

Right of First Offer 2

Right of First Negotiation 3

Right of First Refusal 3

Grant of all Three Rights is Optimal 4

Implementation 4

In Writing and Recorded 4

Careful Drafting 5

Use Models as Guides 5

Prior Liens 5

Resources at ConservationTools.org 6

Introduction

Creating Opportunity

Conservation organizations often encounter situations where they want to acquire a particular property important to their goals but the owners have no interest in selling. Some owners may never want to sell or may want to leave such matters to their heirs. Owners may tell an organization that they will be sure to approach the organization if they ever consider selling, but experience suggests that such assurances shouldn't inspire confidence: when owners eventually come around to selling, they may have forgotten conversations of years passed or think it not worth the trouble of reaching out to what they perceive as a cash-strapped organization.

A grant by the owners to the organization of a right of first purchase can provide the organization certainty that it will have some opportunity to vie for the property if and when the owners (or their heirs) contemplate a sale. A right of first purchase can be a right of first offer, a right of first negotiation, a right of first refusal or a combination of these rights.

A right of first offer requires the owners to offer the property, on terms of their choosing, to the person who holds the right (called the "holder" or "grantee") before offering the property to others. (Alternatively, a right of first offer can be structured to have the grantee, upon notice from the owners that they are interested in selling, make the first offer.) A right of first negotiation, which may be appended to a right of first offer, goes one step further and requires the owners to negotiate with the holder in good faith for some period of time. A right of first refusal allows the holder the right, after offers are solicited from others, to match any offer that the owners are willing to accept. These rights are often combined so that the holder has the first opportunity to act on owners' interest in selling and the assurance that, if the owners' initial expectations are unrealistic (that is, before the property is placed on the market), there is still the opportunity to match a price offered by a third party buyer after the property has been exposed to the market.

A right of first purchase provides to an organization the guarantee of an opportunity to consider or make an offer on a property. The negotiation of a right of first offer, negotiation or refusal may also provide a second benefit—serving to break the ice with an owner; this may be a first step toward building a relationship that eventually leads to more concrete and creative arrangements for the conservation of the property.

Model Documents

The Pennsylvania Land Trust Association has published, at ConservationTools.org, a number of guides and model documents to help conservation organizations obtain commitments from owners regarding the potential future sale of their property interests. Publications include:

- The Model Grant of Purchase Option with Commentary is used to establish the right of an organization to purchase property for a fixed or ascertainable price at a fixed time. The guide Purchase Options discusses a number of circumstances in which a purchase option can be a useful tool for conservation organizations, whether the subject is a land or conservation easement acquisition.
- The Model Grant of Right of First Offer with Commentary provides a tool for establishing both a right of first offer and a right of first negotiation for the benefit of a conservation organization.
- The Model Grant of Right of First Refusal and Commentary provides a tool for establishing a right of a first refusal for the benefit of a conservation organization.

Comparison of Purchase Rights

Conservation organizations interested in acquiring land from owners not presently interested in selling can respond to owners' concerns more readily and with greater versatility if they are familiar with the real estate tools suited for this circumstance.

Example. The conservation organization has identified, as a top conservation priority, acquisition of a tract owned by a conservation-minded family. The goal of the organization is to add the land to its adjacent preserve. The owners are good stewards of the land but have no interest in selling at present; nor are they likely to want to sell while they are healthy and still enjoying the land, deferring such matters involving mortality to the future, most likely to their estate and heirs.

Strategies. If acquisition is not a possibility, at least in the short term, what other strategies may be advanced by the land trust?

- Conservation easement. A conservation easement protecting the land's natural and scenic resources is a worthwhile step but does not achieve the ultimate goal of incorporating the land into the preserve.

- Purchase option. A purchase option granted to the conservation organization may be a possibility. As discussed in the guide Purchase Options, the purchase option is triggered at a specific time (in this case a remote date such as that of the death of the owners) and at a specific, or ascertainable, price (in this case, fair value established by appraisal because the time for exercise of the option is likely far in the future).
- Right of first offer. If the owners do not want to commit to a purchase price established by an unknown appraiser, the right of first offer may provide the conservation organization some protection against a hasty sale to a third party without its knowledge. In this example, the grant of a right of first offer will be triggered under the same circumstances as the purchase option. The difference is in how the purchase price is determined—appraisal versus the owners' discretion at the future date. The right of first offer (which may also provide the opportunity for further negotiation before the property is placed on the market) is discussed in this guide and in the commentary to the Model Grant of Right of First Offer.
- Right of first refusal. The right of first refusal is triggered just before the property is to be sold to a third party. The purchase price is firm (the same price offered by the third party) but the right to purchase must be exercised quickly by the conservation organization without any time for negotiation. The right of first refusal is discussed in this guide and in the commentary to the Model Grant of Right of First Refusal.

Right of First Offer

Landowners are often willing to accommodate a right of first offer because the detriment to them is minimal. All they have to do is notify the holder of the right, before they list the property for sale, of the terms they are willing to accept. The offered terms do not have to be reasonable or comparable to market. The right of first offer alone (without the addition of a right of first negotiation, described below) is a “take it or leave it” proposition -- there is no obligation on the part of the owners to consider a counterproposal. If the offer is not accepted within the agreed upon response time, then the owners can move forward with their marketing plan without any further need to deal with the holder.

Alternatively, the right of first offer can be structured to have the holder, upon notice from the owners that the owners are interested in selling, make the first offer. This configuration likewise places minimal burden on the owners. Owners are under no obligation to accept the holder’s offer; their only inconvenience is having to provide notice to the holder and wait the specified period of time for holder to make an offer before placing the property on the market.

The principal advantage to a conservation organization of holding a right of first offer is that the organization will be alerted when the property will soon be available for purchase. The owners may not offer or be willing to accept a reasonable offer without first experiencing how potential buyers respond to a listing of the property on the real estate market. Even so, the organization has the opportunity, before the property is marketed, to build a relationship with the owners; educate them on conservation strategies that may benefit them or be of interest to them, whether or not the conservation organization is in a position to purchase; and to prepare for making a better informed offer that the owners may take more seriously after the property has been exposed to the reality of the market.

Example. The owners want to leave all of their options open should they ever want, or need, to sell their property. On the other hand, their preferred purchaser, all else being equal, is the conservation organization and they have told the conservation organization they have every intention of giving them an opportunity to buy before listing the property.

Right of First Negotiation

A right of first negotiation is not a stand-alone right but an add-on to the right of first offer. The purpose is to provide time after an initial offer is rejected for counterproposals to be made and, if possible, for the holder to reach agreement with the owners before others can make competing offers.

The grant of first offer will establish the amount of time allowed for negotiation. A reasonable period for negotiation may be 30 days and often up to 90.

The Model Grant of Right of First Offer provides that both parties will negotiate in good faith during the stipulated negotiation period. If the owners and the holder do not come to terms within the negotiation period, there is no further obligation on the part of the owners unless the holder also holds a right of first refusal.

Example. The owners’ offered sales price is, in the opinion of the conservation organization, well above its market value. A right of first negotiation appended to the right of first offer allows the conservation organization time to organize a responsible and responsive counteroffer based on market information and an analysis of physical and legal constraints on developability.

Right of First Refusal

A right of first refusal is triggered only after the owners have successfully marketed the property. The owners must hold off accepting a satisfactory offer received from a third party during the acceptance period specified in the grant of right of first refusal so that the holder can decide whether to match it. The length of this period can be expected to be considerably shorter than the time period for a response to a first offer because, unlike the first offer, the first refusal creates a risk that a third party buyer will withdraw a satisfactory offer if the owner can’t respond promptly. A prospective buyer typically gives the seller only a few days to accept an offer. If the right of first refusal’s acceptance period is longer than the decision period allowed to the owner by the third party buyer, the owner risks losing a satisfactory sale due to the holder not matching the third party’s offer and the third party buyer choosing not to extend their offer.

The grant of a first refusal may be attractive to those owners who, all other considerations being equal, would prefer a sale to the conservation organization soliciting the right of first refusal.

Example. An elderly owner prefers his land to be acquired by the conservation organization upon his death but without any detriment to the value of his estate. He could grant a purchase option that would give the organization the right to acquire the land at its value established by the appraisal for estate tax purposes but he suspects that the appraised value established for those purposes may be on the low side of comparable values. Instead, he proposes a right of first refusal triggered when the estate is about to sell to a third party, who is likely to be a residential developer.

A conservation organization will need time to analyze the real estate offer made by the third party buyer to the owner and, if the details are satisfactory, obtain necessary internal approval. The organization probably will need time to obtain financing as well.

However, as explained, the owner granting a right of first refusal is likely to want to be sure that the time allowed to the organization to respond is short. Combining a right of first refusal with rights of first offer and negotiation can ameliorate this serious time constraint.

Grant of all Three Rights is Optimal

Optimally, a conservation organization will obtain from owners all three rights of first purchase—an initial offer from the owners with sufficient time to negotiate a mutually acceptable transaction followed by a right of first refusal if the negotiations are unsuccessful. The logic is straightforward:

- Many owners have unrealistic expectations regarding the market value of their property, resulting in their first offer to the organization being unacceptably over-priced. Agreement may be unlikely at this juncture but the conservation organization benefits by knowing that the property is soon to be marketed for sale.
- The right of first negotiation provides the organization the opportunity to respond with a realistic offer and explain the reasoning behind the offer before risking the loss of the property to another bidder on the open market. Even if agreement is not reached, the organization has had the opportunity to (1) build a relationship with the owners that may lead to successful future negotiations after the property has been exposed to the market; (2) educate the owners on a range of conservation options; and (3) better familiarize itself with the property.

- The warning that the property will be marketed for sale provided by the right of first offer combined with the time provided by the right of first negotiation places the conservation organization in a much better position to prepare for and make a quick decision to accept or reject terms offered to it as a result of a right of first refusal.

Example. The conservation organization obtains from the owners both a grant of first offer using the default provisions of the Model Grant of Right of First Offer and a grant of first refusal using default provisions of the Model Grant of Right of First Refusal. Years later the organization receives notice from the owners of their intent to sell the property:

- The organization has thirty days to decide whether to accept the owners' offer; plus
- The organization has thirty days to offer a counterproposal and continue negotiations; and
- If negotiations fail to result in a sale, the Grantee may continue its due diligence investigations and pursuit of funding sources as the owners engage in marketing the property; and
- Thus, if Grantee has used the time to organize itself, it may be in a position to issue a quick (and properly authorized) response when the right of first refusal is triggered.

Implementation

In Writing and Recorded

A prudent conservation organization will want the owners' promises regarding rights of first purchase to be both in writing and in recordable form:

- An oral promise is of doubtful enforceability under Pennsylvania law.
- If the written promise isn't recorded, then, if the owners subsequently sell the property to a third party without the owners honoring their commitment to the organization, the third party takes the property free of any duty to the organization. In other words, the third party buyers have no obligation to honor a promise made by the owners.

conclude that the low risks and costs do not merit pursuit of subordination.

Careful Drafting

Grants of rights of first offer, negotiation and refusal must be carefully negotiated and drafted to achieve the desired outcome. The conservation organization must ask for exactly what it wants. If it simply requests a right of first refusal, that is what it will get—a right to match an offer, likely within a time period that is far too short to make a prudent decision. If it requests a right of first offer and doesn't clarify that it wants the offer followed by a period of good faith negotiation and a right of first refusal, it'll likely ultimately receive an offer that demands too much for the property with no opportunity to negotiate and no guarantee that the owners will come back to the organization once market realities realign the owners' expectations.

Use Models as Guides

The Model Grant of Right of First Offer and Model Grant of Right of First Refusal provide templates for establishing rights of first purchase and, together with their respective commentaries, provide the user with guides to key concerns that need to be resolved when establishing these rights.

Prior Liens

The conservation organization will lose its rights under grants of first purchase if (1) there are prior liens on the property, (2) no subordination or other appropriate agreement has been obtained from the lien holder to recognize the rights of the conservation organization, and (3) a foreclosure subsequently occurs. However, if the risk of foreclosure is low and the conservation organization has paid little, if any, consideration for the rights, owners are unlikely to be willing to obtain subordination given the difficulty involved. As such, an organization may reasonably

Resources at ConservationTools.org

To find experts on the topics covered by this guide, see the right hand column of the on-line edition at <http://conservationtools.org/guides/show/24>. The on-line edition also contains the most up-to-date listing of related library items and guides.

Library Categories

Model Instruments for Potential Acquisitions

Doing Deals

Related Guides

Purchase Options: Gaining the Right Without the Obligation to Acquire Property Interests

Purchase and Sale Agreements

Matching the Form of Agreement to the Project

Submit Comments

Help improve the next edition of this guide. Email your suggestions to the Pennsylvania Land Trust Association at aloza@conserveland.org. Thank you.

Acknowledgements

Patricia L. Pregmon, attorney at law, is the primary author, and Andrew M. Loza, the contributing author and editor.

The Pennsylvania Land Trust Association published this guide with support from the William Penn Foundation and the Community Conservation Partnerships Program, Environmental Stewardship Fund, under the administration of the Pennsylvania Department of Conservation and Natural Resources, Bureau of Recreation and Conservation.

Nothing contained in this or any other document available at ConservationTools.org is intended to be relied upon as legal advice. The authors disclaim any attorney-client relationship with anyone to whom this document is furnished. Nothing contained in this document is intended to be used, and cannot be used, for the purpose of (i) avoiding penalties under the Internal Revenue Code or (ii) promoting, marketing or recommending to any person any transaction or matter addressed in this document.

© 2015, 2012, 2009

Pennsylvania Land Trust Association

Text may be excerpted and reproduced with acknowledgement of ConservationTools.org and the Pennsylvania Land Trust Association.